Your support gives hope to our tiniest miracles.

Mater Prize Home has been changing lives since 1954! That's more than seven decades of sensational properties, big winners and incredible support from YOU! Thank you for helping to fund the vital medical research, equipment and patient care, that has offered hope and healing to thousands of patients... just like Tenayah.

When baby Tenayah was born at just 22 weeks and three days, her parents, Tania and Tyrone, weren't thinking about the future. They were preparing to say goodbye to their daughter.

Weighing less than a tub of butter, Tenayah was so tiny her skin was translucent. Her lungs were dangerously underdeveloped, and at the time, no baby in Australia was believed to have survived being born so early.

For babies born at 22 weeks, survival had historically been less than 20 per cent. But in those critical first moments, Mater's doctors and nurses refused to give up. They fought to resuscitate Tenayah and gave her the chance she desperately needed.

"I honestly didn't allow myself to have hope that our beautiful little girl would survive," Tyrone recalls.

But Tenayah wasn't ready to give up.

Her fight continued for 158 days in Mater's Neonatal Critical Care Unit, where she battled severe lung issues, infections and complications affecting her eyes, bones and digestive system.

Slowly, day by day, Tenayah grew stronger.

After five long months, she was finally well enough to leave hospital and go home.

Today, that tiny fighter is a thriving little girl, preparing to take her first steps.

"She's the kind of kid who's going to climb Mount Everest and do all the things that seem impossible," says Tania. "Because she's already achieved the impossible by surviving at 22 weeks."

Just a decade ago, Tenayah may never have had that chance.

"Thanks to advances in neonatal care and research, more babies born extremely prematurely are surviving and going on to live healthy lives," says Head of Mater Neonatology Dr Pita Birch. "Every breakthrough helps answer critical questions about survival, reducing complications and improving long-term outcomes."

Your support helps fund life-changing research and gives more families the hope of bringing their tiniest miracles like Tenayah home.
